A technique using a needle electrode inserted into the masseter muscle has been developed to study the electrical activity of the masseter muscle during voluntary clenching at different initial jaw positions. The initial jaw position exerted on the masseter muscles has a very strong effect on the amplitude and the phase of the electromyographic (EMG) response evoked by acoustic stimulation. In the range of 0-60 degrees, the amplitudes of the reflex responses are maximal at 0 degrees, minimum at about 45 degrees, and are seen to fall to their minimum at 60 degrees. A similar variation of the phase lag between
